What is the London Military Museums Network (LMMN) and what do we aim to do?

Provide regular meetings at which members can discuss matters relating to the management of military museums and collections, encouraging collaborative working to ensure that relevant objects, artefacts and archives are recorded, displayed and conserved for current and future generations.

Promote the exchange of ideas between members encouraging a spirit of cooperation ensuring that the objects, artefacts and archives of each collection are accessible and where appropriate displayed for the benefit and education of the public and military communities alike, including special interest groups and organisations of all age groups and cultures.

Develop, encourage and exploit complementary policies, practices and collaborative working opportunities where appropriate, that will best support the preservation of objects, artefacts and archives within the Network collections.

Encourage joint publicity and mutual promotion of facilities and exhibitions.

Collaborate on projects which improve intellectual or physical access to museum collections.

Make best use of the knowledge and capability of the Network for the benefit of Military Heritage in the region.

How can we help you?

Enquire with us about visiting multiple sites, or choosing the best one to suit your needs.

Ask our advice on how to contact Archive teams for family heritage enquiries.

Challenge us to help you with project research or educational projects

Enquiries about joining LMMN should be put forward to:

The Fusilier Museum tells the story of a British infantry regiment, raised at the Tower of London in 1685. The museum follows the Regiment from its formation to the present day. The story is told through the fascinating personal experiences of individual Officers and Soldiers and draws on the museum's rich archive of war diaries and personal letters as well as its diverse collection.

The Household Cavalry Museum Archive, Education and Storage Facility is located in the former regimental museum building at Combermere Barracks, Windsor. It is here that we hold extensive records of individual soldiers who served in the 1st Life Guards, 2nd Life Guards, The Life Guards, Royal Horse Guards (Blues) and the Household Battalion. We also have a great deal of related material including officers' records of service, regimental order books and diaries, regimental returns, medical officer's returns, regimental appointment books, court martial ledgers, casualty books, register of deserters, marriage and baptism rolls, attestation and discharge books, etc. A research service is available at Windsor and all work is undertaken by Museum Volunteers and as we receive no direct funding, there is a charge for each service.

Group tours and school visits of the site are available by prior agreement and include a visit to the 1804 Riding School, the Light Armoured Division and when possible a viewing of the collection of silver at the NCO and Warrant Officer's Mess. The Reserve Collection is also here and some selected items are on display for visitors to admire.

The National Army Museum is the leading authority on the history of the British Army. Founded in 1960 by Royal Charter and established for the purpose of collecting, preserving and exhibiting objects and records relating to the Land Forces of the British Crown it is a museum that moves, inspires, challenges, educates and entertains. The Museum seeks to tell the story of the British Army, the personal experiences of the soldiers who have served in it and to connect the British public and its Army demonstrating how the role of the Army and its actions are still relevant today.

The Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall homes the wonderful The Museum of Army Music displaying instruments and other interesting artefacts with connections to military music. This small but fascinating collection delves into military music from the last two hundred years, including a bugle found on the battlefield the day after the Battle of Waterloo and a Cavalry Trumpet used at The Charge of the Light Brigade. Interactive displays of music, instruments, uniforms and other relevant material provide a rare insight into a tradition which has become part of the fabric of British ceremonial life.

As a secure MoD site the Archive is only open for specific research enquiries, and by prior appointment only during week days.

The First Aid Nursing Yeomanry Archive is located in a secure MoD site in London. We hold records and documents concerning the thousands of women who have served with the FANYs since the Corps was founded in 1907, including those who served through two World Wars and continue to support civil and military authorities within London today.

We are only able to arrange visits for specific research enquiries but we do offer a research service by our Volunteers. As a registered charity we would ask enquirers to make a donation to cover this service.
